SMA

Hi Friends, my name is Casey.

I was diagnosed with spinal muscular atrophy (SMA) when I was just five days old through newborn screening. SMA is a rare, genetic disease that affects the motor neurons, the nerve cells that tell our muscles how to move. Before life-changing treatments were discovered, many babies with SMA did not live past the age of two.

At 15 days old, I received gene therapy, a one-time treatment that gave my body the chance to produce the protein my muscles need to function. That treatment gave me a fighting chance.

Today, I am almost three years old. Because of early diagnosis and continued advancements in research, I get to grow, learn and explore my world. But SMA is still part of my everyday life. I am unable to stand or walk independently, things many children my age do without even thinking about. I can't simply run across a room or climb onto the couch on my own.

But I do have something pretty cool, a walker that helps me move. With my family right by my side, I practice walking and building strength. Every step I take in that walker represents years of research, countless therapy sessions, and a community that believes in kids like me.

This past year, I started two additional treatments to help my body stay strong. I participate in an expanded access program designed to help build my tiny but mighty muscles, and I take a daily medication called Evrysdi, to help my body produce more of the essential protein needed to support my motor neurons.

I have also developed severe scoliosis and soon, I will be receiving a feeding tube to ensure my body gets the nutrition it needs to grow stronger. While this is another step in my journey, it is also a reminder that proactive care and medical advancements allow kids like me to keep moving forward.

There are other children like me. Some were diagnosed too late to benefit from early intervention, others are thriving and reaching milestones that once seemed impossible. There are children, teens and adults who face significant challenges with SMA. But we all share one common hope. We want a cure.

Cure for Casey was created because everyone living with SMA deserves every chance to grow, move, and thrive. Your support fuels research, and helps families navigating the realities of this disease. Because of you, the future of SMA looks different than it once did, because of you, I'm here and my story is still being written.

Thank you,
Casey Little & Family
